Often it is not a man's life that is the story, but the legacy of his actions.

In the small north-east Antrim coastal town of Horseshoe Bay in Northern Ireland, the murdered body of a priest's aunt is found lying at the foot of St Johns church altar one Friday morning. Sergeant Tim Dickens - formerly Detective Sergeant Dickens of Patriarch Central - is given the task of solving the crime by DCI Callow in the hope that it will speed up the sergeant's return to the big city after his messy demotion two years earlier. Though Dickens is the only cop inhabiting the Glenbay Station, and the sole member of the Police Service of Northern Ireland stationed in a predominantly republican area, financial restraints mean his official aid will come in the form of a single raw recruit, PC Robbie McWhirter. Within forty-eight hours the two cops find themselves landed with more dead women than they can handle, each one baring a different mutilation yet with a set of similarly strange body marks. As suspects fall by the wayside and leads fritter out, Dickens finds himself making mutually beneficial arrangements with certain locals who, not so long ago would rather he weren't around, for the sake of the case. Eventually, he also turns to his friend, Shauny Houbara, a criminal psychologist and his safe harbour during those torrent Patriarch days. When an old foe, McFetteridge, the journalist credited with Dickens' demise, turns up, Dickens reluctantly decides to use the man's dubious snooping talents. Together they struggle to pick through a web of religious and medical intrigue, set against the backdrop of close knit rural life. But time is running out. DCI Callow has staked his own reputation on Dickens' undoubted ability and now finds the press and his superiors breathing down his neck. Dickens is given until Monday morning to close the case... or forfeit his career.
